

Julia Michaels: Inner Monologue Tour

I spent this weekend traveling to the heart of San Diego, California to see Julia Michaels and Corey Harper with my long distance best friend. We had Meet & Greet packages, and the second I walked into that room, Julia Michaels greeted me with the biggest, tightest hug and began laughing with me over literally nothing. She talked with me for a while, recognized me from Twitter and told me I had an incredible voice. She is the most playful, happy girl and all of this showed during her performance. Her opening act, Corey Harper, was unlike any opening act I have ever seen. His vocals were so strong, his falsetto rang even after he finished singing. It was just him and a guitar, but I was completely captivated by his acoustic set.

After receiving his guitar pick, Julia Michaels' set got put up with inflatable flowers and the most exotic, colorful set. Her and her band came exploding onto the stage with so much energy, excitement and light. She danced like a little kid on Christmas morning. She was absolutely glowing. Her voice live is something unbelievable. She sings each note so well and puts so much into her songs, she even cried during her last one. She came out into the crowd, sang with all of the fans, held hands and had a personal relation with every single person. With songs like "Into You", "Pink" and "Make It Up To You", her concert was full of jumping, dancing, and not caring about what anyone thought of you. This is a perfect example of the effect concerts have on our spiritual well being, because every single person in the crowd was on top of the world that night. I'll be attending her shows again in November and I'll be counting down the days!
