

Harry Styles: Live On Tour

Harry Styles sold out the beautiful Greek Theatre in September of 2017. The Greek Theatre is a personal favorite venue of mine. After driving to the top of Griffith Park, I grabbed a cup of coffee and headed to my terrace seat embedded into the side of a lush green mountain side. His opening act set a perfect tone with a mix of rock, indie and pop. When the lights finally dropped and it was time for Harry Styles, his silhouette appeared on a pink floral curtain as the intro to his song “Only Angel” started playing. The scene was comparable to that of entering actual heaven.

He swept the crowd away with his blue floral Gucci Suit and owned the side of that mountain that night. He sang songs by his former band One Direction, covered a few songs and cracked jokes with the fans. He makes every single performance so personalized and sets it apart from the rest of the shows. With each song, he has the crowd swaying, crying, or going absolutely nuts. He has so much energy that rubs off on every single audience member and turns his shows into a total riot.

I saw him again the next summer in 2018 when he sold out a “Concert In The Round” arena tour. His album had been a constant success for months and everyone wanted in on the action. I saw him in Denver when he performed at the Pepsi Center. Although he performed the same songs, he mixed up his setlist, had a country singer for his opening act, and even made a visit to the B-stage to interact with his and in the back of the arena. He ran past and grabbed my hand, officially making July 3rd one of the best days of my life. He performed a few more old-school One Direction songs and even sang some of his unreleased music. Harry Styles was born to be on the stage.

He's full of energy and thrives off of the fans in the audience. He gets completely possessed by the music and transforms into an absolute rockstar. Harry Styles on stage is a legacy that will go down in history. He's gonna have teenage girls in 2050 wishing they were born in the late 90's just by singing a few songs on stage.
